

Who's Who on Campus?

Campuses have various offices, positions and people, as well as partner organizations in the community, that can be overwhelming for students to understand and navigate. If survivors, people with disabilities, or other marginalized identities feel their needs are disregarded there can be distrust in the services on campus.

Campus sexual assault counselors should be in tune with these environmental factors and address issues of confidentiality, philosophy of services provided, and accessibility in outreach materials.

What you can do

If you do not already have this available on your campus already, create a document that describes the resources available for medical care, support, and any individuals on campus required to report a disclosure of sexual assault. Be sure to identify whether a resource is confidential or not.

Example: Sexual Violence Support Services and Reporting (UC Davis)

Resources to share with student survivors

1. A survivor-centered resource for understanding Title IX and various processes in a choice-based way.

Example: Student Survivor Toolkit (Equal Rights Advocates)

2. The victim rights or survivor's bill of rights.

Example: Survivor's Bill of Rights (University of Massachusetts Amherst)
